Fifth Sunday of Easter A New Commandment

In the modern world, there is a rush to attain new things; everything is advertised as new, renovated, and different. On the other hand, few things are permanent; people move, change their home, job, activities, and even their friends. Perhaps we have become accustomed to the fact that people we live with may often depart toward new horizons; and this leaves us with a sort of nostalgia or longing for what was, for the time that past which was better. We want new things, but we also want to keep what we had in the past.

The people, who go away, always leave something behind; some leave us material keepsakes, while others want us to care for something left behind, which may even be an inheritance; but they also leave a void. Jesus departed after his death, leaving a void in the hearts of his friends that only God could fill; but he also left a mandate and a mission that should not only change our life, it will help us build a new world created by God through the death and resurrection of Christ: "Behold I make all things new." The mandate of Jesus, which could revolutionize the world, is to love one another. This is not a love that consists of pretty sentiments, nor is it just directed toward the people we like; it's a different type of love that dares to forgive, to overcome difficulties, seeks the good in others, even at the cost of self sacrifice; this is the love that distinguishes this new city of God. Today Jesus is calling us to a love like he does, to love God and love others as God loves them. Easter is a fitting time to remember the Lord's new commandment, because there is no greater symbol of love than Easter; it is a call to joy with love as its source.
